Community Profile

History

Unlike many other planning districts in Mississauga, such as Port Credit, Malton and Streetsville, the lands known today as the Creditview Community did not include an historic village. The subject lands were part of the hinterland associated with the historic villages of Cooksville and Erindale. The 1877 Historic Atlas of Peel County indicates that seven families owned the farmland that the Creditview Planning District encompasses, with approximately one-third of the land in the ownership of the Crozier family. One of the Crozier family residences still stands in the community, located at the north end of Perivale Road, and is listed on the Mississauga Heritage Inventory for its architectural significance.

The Township of Toronto Official Plan, approved in 1953, confirmed the land use of most of Creditview for agricultural purposes, with the exception of the most easterly lands which were designated residential.

Between 1973 and mid 1977, all the lands west of Mavis Road were designated to permit industrial development. Despite the industrial and residential land use designations, Creditview remained mostly undeveloped with some parts used for low intensity farming. The Creditview Secondary Plan, approved in February of 1978 re-established Creditview as a residential community.

Today, Creditview is a recently established, stable, residential district, providing mostly detached dwellings. The District is served by the Erindale GO station, three retail commercial centres and benefits from its proximity to the City Centre.
